He said that so-called friends of China sometimes remark "the most interesting thing would be to find out how to open up China."

Was it not fair, he urged, to ask whether China had no views of her own as to how she should be opened up? Judging from the way some people talked, Chu Chao Hain continued, China was very much in the cial feast, with people talked, Chu Chao Hsin continued, China was very much in the position of some joint at a sacrificial feast, with every guest trying to discuss how they could best carve it up to their own advantage, while all the time pretending they were really actuated by the greatest good will toward the animal which had furnished the chief dish.

He reminded his hearers that the American secretary of state, John Hay, who eriginated the policy of the "open door," had said: "Whoever understands China socially, politically, economically, religiously, holds the key to the world's politics for the next five centuries."
